In a corner of a large supermarket's warehouse, food often piles up that never makes it onto the shelves because its outer packaging is slightly dented or its expiry date is only a few days away. It is perfectly fine to eat, but hard to sell. Somewhere in the same neighborhood, there are neighbors worried about their next meal. The bridge that connects surplus food and tables in need is the 'food bank.' Simply put, a food bank means 'an organization and system that receives donations of food that is still edible but has become hard to sell, stores it, and distributes it to people who struggle
